Strive; yet I do not promise The prise you dream of to-day, Will not fade when you think to grasp it,

And melt in your hand away; But another and holier treasure You would now perchance disdain, Will come when your toil is over, And pay you for all your pain.

Wait ; yet I do not tell you The hour you long for now, Will not cone with its radiance vanished. And a shadow upon its brow : Yet far through the misty future,

With a crewn of starry light, An hour of joy you know not Is winging her silent flight. Pray; though the gift you ask for May never comfort your fears, May never repay your pleading,

Yet pray, and with hopeful tears: An answer, not that you long for, But diviner, will come one day : Your eyes are too dim to see it. Yet strive, and wait, and pray.

The Northern Aristocracy.

A Philadelphian, in a novel entitled "Our First Families," draws the following picture of the aristocracy of the North : The subjoined correspondence was read at a meet-"If you were called upon to make up a delegation ing of the Sheffield committee for investigating forof the talent, learning, genius, and virtue of the country, you would no more dream of making your selection from the soi-disant 'aristocracy,' than you would think of choosing a representation of our material greatness and wealth from among the men of genius and intellectual or personal distinction .-Never were the two elements of material and moral superiority so widely separated as in this country. Our aristocracy, as a general fact, have not even countrymen, which resulted in a second journey, and wrote to that gentleman, and received the following dress badly, they speak badly, they eat, drink and sleep badly. They wear gaudy dresses; they talk loudly and giggle, and affect false modesty in public; they are fond of slang, scandal, and low literature; they are rude and insolent to their inferiors, and mean and oppressive to their domestics. They always take pains to assert themselves, which a truly high bred person never does, except by the unconscious quietness of his dress, appearance, language and manner; and they exhaust their lives and fortunes in ridiculous attempts to outdress, outbuild, and outshine one another. In a word, that which passes itself off as the aristocracy of this country would be deemed only the snobbery of another. Go to Washington in winter, to Saratoga in summer, or look in at any time at a fashionable hotel or an 'exclusive' party; see the airs, the pretensions, the grimaces; listen to the subjects of conversation, and the tone of voice, the language, and the manner in which they are treated; criticise the dresses, the license of talk among the young men and women, the loud laughing, the squirming and per-
